"There is little tangible evidence as yet that the turning point in business has been reached, but general sentiment is more hopeful. Wholesale trade is rather more active, while retail demands have broadened under the stimulus of the usual clearance sales and more season-able weather in some sections. Full resumption of operations is reported at New England footwear factories, which have a sufficient volume of contracts on their books to keep machinery busy for some time to come.

"A moderate expansion is noted in leather, and firmness is manifest in all branches. The reduction in the minimum discount charge of the Bank of England discount charge of the Bank of England on Thursday was a prominent feature of the week, and considerable attention also was attracted by the pronounced strength of foreign exchange, which has advanced sharply since the opening of the year. Substantial reductions have been made on men's wear fabrics for fall in the openings which are now in progress. Do-mestic values are as low as those on openings which are now in progress. Do-mestic values are as low as those on foreign cloths and a considerable share of business is expected by the home mills. "In view of the fact that the season has not opened fully as yet, business in footwear is of fairly satisfactory pro-portions. Some complaints are received from wholesalers as to the volume of portions. Some complaints are received from wholesalers as to the volume of trade with the smaller retailers, but this is a matural condition immediately following the holidays.

"Irregularity was the chief characteristic of the markets for the leading farm staples, although the trend of corn was almost wholly downward. That cereal was depressed by heavy liquidation, which was prompted largely by very liberal receipts and a substantial increase in the domestic visible supply. Sentiment was decidedly bearish, and new low price levels for the crop were reached. Wheat was affected to some degree by the developments in the coarser grain, but relatively more steadiness was shown."

Mildred sighed and shifted wearily in her chair. Then with a resolute little squaring of her shoulders she dipped her pen and went back to her interminable addressing. With the case of long practice she turned a card in the file drawer and slipped the top envelope off onto the finished pile. "Mrs. M. Jones," she read, and copied mechanically and turned to the next.

"Heavens, I'm tired," the girl next to her said, yawning frankly. Mildred smiled sympathetically without looking up. The girl, Kitty, laid down her pen and opened and closed her cramped fingers.

"I'll never get used to sitting still so long if I address every day for the rest of my life," she went on, idly watching Mildred's flying fingers and swift system. "You've addressed before, haven't you? You're a wonder at it."

"No, I haven't." Mildred answered, "only there's nothing to it."

"Six dollars is pretty good pay for beginners, isn't it?" Kitty went on, conversationally. "Heavens, I'm tired," the girl next to

"Yes," Mildred answered, dully won dering how she was going to live on that pay. It set off a train of thought and Mildred, a year ago, had been a petted schoolgirl and today she was won-dering how she could make her living fit inside the $6 limit. She had always supposed herself to be well-to-do. Her guardian had never refused her any-thing. But at his sudden death she had discovered that for years he had been bringing her up 13 a dearly loved daugh-ter, not as a financially dependent ward. Failing a will, his money had all gone to his only son, a roving chap, who as rer, not as a financially dependent ward.

Failing a will, his money had all gone to his only son, a roving chap, who as yet had never turned up to claim it. And Mildred, except for a tiny bank account, was penniless. With no training whatever in the wise spending of money, it was a marvel that Mildred had managed to live a scant six months on it. Now it was all gone but one last bill, and improvident Mildred was hard at work for a living. Toward the end of the day Mildred grew slightly self-pityling as she thought of the future she had been so sure of—a little home, her own money, and—John.

That last thought was almost more than she could bear. It seemed so much more than a year before that she had lost John's letter. The letter that had said he would come for her if she would write; that he had his land and could to be last to her as she stood on the top step poised for a flight to the city, and after one happy glance at the first page and it into her bag. And an hour later the bag was gone, letter and all.

She had advertised persistently but uses lessly. The letter was gone and in it the precious unknown address that had meant more than anything on earth to her—and still did. Even after a year of silence the thought of John Burkhart set her heart racing.

With a little shake, Mildred brought here is a caller for you, honey," she heard "Id so down," Mildred moaned.

Miss Edler sat down beside her and "Id so down," Mildred moaned.

Miss Edler sat down beside her and stroked her hot head. "Id go down, dearie," she counseled, and suddenly Mildred decided to. At least she would be free from the thought of John for With a little shake, Mildred brought herself back to the work of the moment, and went on steadily turning card after card, shifting envelope after envelope-ble but doing it all through a mist of lonely
